Czar And Family Not Slain,

CPYRGH Publisher Asserts

History says Russian Czar Nicholas II, his wife and their five children were slaughtered in Siberia by the Bolsheviks in 1918 to prevent their rescue by imperial supporters. History says the bodies of the Romanov dynasty leader and his family were wrapped in blankets, carried from their basement execution chamber, placed on the ground, loaded on lorries, taken to an abandoned mine pit and burned. However, Robert Speller, New York publisher, reports he has investigated a claim that all five of the czar's children (four girls and a boy) are alive. The son and three daughters now are in the United States, he asserts, adding that legal steps will be started soon to establish the truth of their claim. Mr. Speller's report is in three parts. The Enquirer does not vouch for its authenticity.

BY ROBERT SPELLER

The course of world history changed in 1918 when the Bolsheviks "murdered" the imperial family of Russia. There may be yet another change, as the result of the sensational disclosure in New York that the massacre of the Czar Nicholas II, Czarina Alexandra Feodorovna and their five children never took place.

After more than 46 years the czarevich, Alexei Nikolaevich Romanov, has come forward to rip apart the veil of mystery which has shrouded the events of the fateful night of July 16-17, 1918, at the Ipatiev House in Ekaterinburg, Siberia.

The czarevich, now 60 years old, who, under the name of Col. Michael Gole-niewski, became an American citizen under a private bill introduced in the Congress by Rep. Michael Feighan of Ohio, at the request of CIA because of his services to the United States, shortly will begin the legal steps required to regain control of the Romanov personal fortune, estimated at more than half a billion dollars.

The czarevich has met during the intervening years with his sisters, the Grand Duchess Olga, Tatiana and Marie, and recently with his youngest sister Anastasia in New York at the office of his sister's publisher Robert Speller & Sons.

IN AN interview in New York, the czarevich stated the release and escape of the imperial family was arranged with the full knowledge of Nikolai Lenin and Leon Trotsky and the active participation of Yurovsky, commandant of the Red Guard at the Ipatiev House.
